Certain Apple products have an air of exclusivity to them: the iPhone, the Apple Watch, the iPad. The Mac, while aging, has a certain outdatedness (and occasional humor) to it as well: the Macbook Pro is thick and heavy; the iMac is still large and incomprehensible. Windows, on the other hand, has the solid dependability of a mature operating system, it's sleek and happy, and that's where it feels the most at home. If you use Mac OS X, at least for your desktop, you should check out the Web-based version of Photoshop. The future of computer hardware looks a lot different from what it was just a few years ago. iPads aren't just for reading comics and playing games. With the programs included with the Basic edition of Photoshop, the iPad's totally capable of handling wedding shootings, photography, digital darkroom work, web design, or anything that involves manipulating images. Comparing Adobe Photoshop and Paint Shop Pro is like comparing a horse and a jet plane. Photoshop is the more powerful and advanced version of Paint Shop Pro, but it definitely has some stuff Paint Shop doesn't. In terms of tasks, Photoshop allows you to do more, and it does so much more, that you can't get everything in a Paint Shop program. And Paint Shop is a very powerful program for the things it does. But to say that Photoshop is better than Paint Shop, that simply is not true. The program is very steep and rather complicated.
