The major key to shooting successful portraits of dogs lies in capturing their attitude. If your dog is really paying attention to you, and is looking you straight in the eyes, he'll be more tranquil. When dogs do this, they naturally smile because they love attention. If your dog is looking away from you, or is not even aware of your presence, he will be more stressed out. When dogs attack the photographer, or when it's the other way round, they are upset. For this reason, it is very important to pay attention to the dogs on what they are trying to convey. In this case, you will realize how to shoot successful portraits of dogs. Let's take a look at some of the most essential tips and tricks. Depending on your dog's size, it is possible to adjust the camera to make sure it is angled at his eye level. The rule here is about the length of the camera's horizontal lens. It simply means that whenever the lens tube is longer than the dog's body, you need to adjust it to the length of the dog. If your dog is tall, then you need more time to undress it and capture an image that is looking good. You can also try to cover it in a neutral colored jumper. For everybody else, I'm looking forward to seeing what you can do. Please visit Indextank.com for free stock photos and Canva for free web graphics at 0 cost, and be sure to keep using Photoshop, Illustrator, and Lightroom as I cover them in future posts. Learn more about our parent company. I am a happy Adobe Photoshop Lightroom user since version 4 but I must admit that I was a little disappointed when I read that I was the first to buy the iPad Pro last year as it will never happen that I buy an Apple product that is not actually "better" than my perfect-world device and device which I use for work. Therefore I am a bit annoyed to see that there is no way to use Adobe Creative Cloud apps with Apple iPads like the iPad Air 2. I know that the iPads are not perfect on every point as my test showed but the combination of the two devices is a natural act and always was. Are Apple's developers not capable to at least make "infinitive photomanipulations" as allowed to Photoshop users by Adobe?
